PROGRAM

The group major in Film & Media has been designed to place the history and theory of film into the larger context of humanistic studies. Emphasis is placed on developing students' analytical and critical faculties. Courses are offered in the history of film, the history of film theory, genres, and auteurs. Also offered are numerous elective courses related to the general study of film. A recent update of the Film & Media curriculum has also substantially expanded Production course offerings, both writing-based and practical production.

PREPARATION FOR TRANSFER AT THE JUNIOR LEVEL

Berkeley offers an innovative, interdisciplinary undergraduate program leading to a BA in Film & Media. This rich and diverse program offers rigorous engagement with the entire culture of moving-images in the larger context of humanistic studies, teaching students to think historically, theoretically, and analytically about a wide range of cinematic and para-cinematic forms. At the same time, it encourages students to look at moving-images from the vantage point of other disciplines. The major has expanded recently as well, giving more consideration to practical production, writing-based courses, and expanding the curriculum to cover more New Media topics.

In order to declare the Film & Media major, students must receive a grade of C or higher in either Film 10 - Film History & Form, or Film 20 - Film & Media Theory. It's recommended students take one, or both, of these classes in their first semester. It's also possible to petition to waive out of these requirements with work already completed elsewhere. If you successfully waive out of either Film 10 or Film 20, you will be immediately eligible to declare the Film & Media major.
